Definition of cancer in modern medical science is very disappointing. It is as follows: By some cause or other, a cell in your body goes through a mutation or sudden change and becomes abnormal. Once it becomes abnormal, it multiplies by division indefinitely. First of all, the definition says, By some cause or other... This is the same as saying We do not know why. So to speak, since they do not know the cause, there is no way they can come up with a measure to cope with it. Then it says, A cell in your body goes through a sudden change... A concept such as sudden change is not scientific or logical. Every change in nature has its cause. The fact that they still use words like sudden change shows that today's life science is still very immature. To say the least, the fact that they use words like sudden change in their definition of cancer means that they have not had looked at cancer closely enough in a scientific manner. Carcinoma is just an end product. It is not the cause itself. If you only attack the end product without dealing with the cause, your problem will never go away. When you get cancer, you're almost automatically subject to one of three therapies: 1. Surgical therapy, 2. Chemotherapy and/or 3. Radiation therapy. But you will never be cured completely. Chemotherapy kills cancerous cells but at the same time harms healthy cells and organs too. Radiation therapy is a very dangerous treatment. The cancer tissues undergone treatment may be destroyed, but normal tissues along the way also receive a radiation. As a result, both chemotherapy and radiation therapy can become emergent causes to new cancer. From Chapter 2.
