Chalice: Love, vulnerability, and honesty, or emotional infidelity? Erik Dolson

Peter and Debra meet on the ferry from Seattle to their respective homes on Vincente Island.

Debra, a lawyer who climbs mountains, runs marathons and raises her two children mostly by herself while her pilot husband is away; Peter, a real estate developer who writes, races cars and has two children of his own, and a wife caring for her sick mother.

Debra and Peter begin to correspond via email.

At first they talk about their daily lives, and learn of each other's risky hobbies. Eventually they truly confide, but weave truth and fantasy in made-up worlds where there is only the illusion of safety in the quest to be "known."

They debate fiercely "what's real," until their worlds collide, and they discover that honesty and vulnerability are two different things, and self-deception is the most insidious lie of all.
